Charles Comiskey has ordered his White Sox to report for the Spring training trip to Hot Springs, Ark., on March 10.

There would be no change for the team in the Southland, where work will begin in earnest. The team would have been arranged for the tour all through the South. The Cuban trip had been abandoned, and the team would clash with American baseball players on Southern soil. Commissioner Kilduff would not allow the team to play in the winter season as yet.

It was a relief that with an even break in luck the team would have won the pennant last season and has faith in their skill.

Take Care of Your Teeth and They Will Take Care of You

You Understand That Defects of the Teeth Mean Ruined Health, Years of Suffering—The Experience of Others Falls to Teach

In the simplest, clearest manner possible, the teeth should be kept in order, what function they play in our lives, and HOW YOU MAY TAKE CARE OF THEM. Hundreds of thousands of our readers should read these articles with intelligent care—especially mothers and fathers of children. Intelligent, inexpensive care of the teeth in childhood and youth means everything to health and comfort in later life.

The American people have the worst teeth of any race in the world—except an occasional small people or tribe living in localities where the water or other condition destroys the teeth utterly and abnormally. The principal trouble with the American's teeth is the fact that HE DOES NOT USE THEM. Everything must be USED to be kept in good condition. The American, with his invention of "quick lunch," combined with soft foods that slip down without chewing, or harder food swallowed whole, has succeeded in destroying the teeth more quickly than any other civilized race.

It ought not to be necessary to insist on the importance of having good teeth and OF USING THEM.

The most important process in life—so far as health and strength are concerned—is the process called DIGESTION. Through that process we transform the various products of the earth, meats, vegetables, fruit, etc., into HUMAN BEINGS. That is to say, we take the earth's products and change them by the process of digestion into human blood, bones, flesh, brain, etc.

The first and almost the most important of the digestive processes is done by the teeth.

The teeth grind up the food that is eaten, reducing it to particles sufficiently small to be readily attacked, disintegrated and digested by the juices in the stomach. The operation of chewing, in addition to reducing the food to proper condition, brings about mixture with the saliva. Chewing promotes the activity of the salivary glands. If this process is neglected, the food goes into the stomach in a condition that makes digestion extremely difficult, and, after a certain length of time, IMPOSSIBLE.

When you are chewing your food, or, rather, NEGLECTING to chew it, remember that the work which you fail to do with your teeth MUST BE DONE BY THE STOMACH, WHICH HASN'T ANY TEETH. With out effort, in a perfectly natural way, with only a few minutes' eating time, the teeth can practically solve the problem of digestion. But if you let them remain idle, swallowing your food whole, throwing the burden of the work upon the stomach—work that it cannot do—you inevitably break down the digestive system, prepare yourself for a short life—the latter and out of it full of misery—and incidentally bring upon yourself all the suffering that goes with teeth in bad condition.

The very good dentist whose services we have secured for the benefit of our readers will tell in a series of articles how to take care of the teeth. He will cover the ground for children, men and women in their prime, and for old people.

Read over these articles; read them for your own benefit, for the benefit of your children and any others that you are accustomed to advise.

And after you have learned how the teeth should be cared for TAKE CARE OF THEM AND USE THEM. It is a very simple matter to form the necessary habits of care and preservation. It means everything in the prolonging of life, in improvement of health, and in general all-around efficiency. We shall begin the publication of this series very soon.

A Hungry Child and a Pompous Theory

A number of people are worrying lest the Salvation Army food breakfasts for poor children may breed pauperism.

That argument has salved the conscience of more mean people than any other since dabbling in social economy became a popular dissipation.

The giving of a bowl of soup and a slice of bread to a hungry little boy or girl may engender a habit of dependence, but, fortunately for humanity, most people would rather contemplate this than the spectacle of a child starving through his day's lessons.

The alleged "habit of dependence" is curable at any time by the simple process of withdrawing that on which the subject depends; but it is no such easy matter to correct the results of privation in childhood.

It may be worthy to furnish theories instead of food to strong men, but it is never fair nor civilized to apply them to children who have not the power to be self-sustaining. It is inadmissible that they should be made to suffer in order that a lesson in independence should be taught their parents.

The world owes a child more than an education; it owes him an opportunity to learn, and he cannot learn and starve at the same time. Miss Booth's contention that the immediate need in this case is more to be considered than the remote effect will appeal to every real student of social conditions, for no man can comprehend the problems of life who has no sympathy with suffering. In this field of research the heart must help the head to understand. The man who buttoned his pockets for fear of pauperizing somebody does more harm by his single example than was ever done by charity since the world began.

Municipal Ownership

By William N. Osgood

SENATOR LODGE in a recent address admitted that there was a growing sentiment in favor of government ownership of public utilities, and expressed the opinion that, if such a policy were adopted, that the great fabric of our free government would be undermined—a fearful calamity if true—and that the freedom of the world, and that the freedom of the individual would be threatened.

I submit with all due regard for Mr. Lodge's ripe scholarship, his splendid special training for public life, and his unimpaired integrity, that no man is entitled to express any opinion of his intellectual honesty or ability in frequently attempting to fool the American people, that his position is entirely wrong in regard to the above subjects, except that there is undoubtedly a growing sentiment in favor of government ownership of public utilities.

His proposition that government ownership of public utilities would undermine the fabric of our free government and destroy individual enterprise is about as beyond all reason. Everybody knows that public utilities, privately owned, are based upon special licenses and grants of the government, are monopolies, and are thereby distinguished from private utilities or individual enterprises.

How, therefore, can the recognition by the government of the functions of public utilities, in the past carefully and almost exclusively delegated to private corporations, but privately owned and managed, which are according to the admission of the above-statement, now represent the "small enterprise," a deduction, both public and private? Don't it a matter of common knowledge that individuals cannot successfully compete with public utilities, privately owned and managed, and large ships and specially favored by them? Don't it recognize the fact that the government can and could easily establish uniform rates? When the rail established by the transmission of the mails, the supplying of water, gas, and electricity, etc., it seems to be necessary to argue that the government should own and manage them. Yet it asks a little ingenuity in the discussion to have such an eminent authority in statesmanship, eminent public opinion, and a statesman of the caliber that he should be an advocate of the government ownership of public utilities.
